Overview of the Conference

The issue of the age of consent and the legal age of marriage is a critical intersection of law, human rights, and social justice. It is an area that directly impacts women's autonomy, health, and opportunities for socio-economic advancement. Despite the global progress in recognizing women's rights, child marriage remains a prevalent issue in many regions, particularly in developing countries. Legal frameworks governing the age of consent and marriage continue to evolve, yet their implementation often remains inconsistent and influenced by cultural norms, economic pressures, and political agendas.

This conference seeks to provide a comprehensive platform for exploring the multifaceted issues surrounding the age of consent, child marriage, and their implications on women's rights. The primary goal is to bring together legal scholars, policymakers, gender activists, and social scientists to engage in a dynamic dialogue on how national and international laws address these challenges and what reforms are needed to protect young girls from early marriage and its harmful consequences.

The discussions will cover several critical areas, including the historical evolution of age-related marriage laws, the role of international human rights conventions, and the influence of social, religious, and cultural factors on marriage practices. Experts will also delve into the socio-economic impact of early marriage, focusing on women's health, education, and overall empowerment. Through the lens of socio-legal analysis, the conference will explore the barriers to legal reform and offer concrete policy recommendations to combat child marriage and improve legal protections for women.

Ultimately, this conference aims to foster a deeper understanding of the legal, cultural, and societal dynamics at play and inspire actionable strategies for creating a more just and equitable society where women and girls can exercise their fundamental rights, free from the constraints of early marriage and coercion.

Participants will have the opportunity to explore the history, evolution, and challenges related to the age of consent and marriage, analyze national and international legal frameworks, and reflect on the intersection of law and societal norms.
